

Opening of the Congress

Hans Brügemann, founder and executive director REGUMED, and Mrs. Hermine Brügemann, executive director REGUMED

The motto for our 48th Bicom Congress is:

Communication – the basis of life

The aim of our Congress is undoubtedly to share information – in other words communicate.

This takes place naturally through the presentations given and the workshops held, where therapists can communicate their experiences of using the Bicom bioresonance method.

Yet, for many therapists, listening to the presentations is not the only reason for attending the Congress. They also enjoy the breaks in between, as it gives them the opportunity to speak with colleagues, many of whom have also become friends. Because there is another important element to all communication, namely resonance.

Resonance comes in different “grades of quality”. It is possible to observe both a minimum level as well as an excellent resonance whenever we engage in a lively exchange of ideas and experiences.

It is such an enriching experience to be able to communicate and resonate with like-minded people in a convivial atmosphere.

We hear precisely this time and again during our Bicom Congresses. Now is a good opportunity to thank you for enabling such open, tolerant and friendly communication to take place.

A number of years ago, Professor Popp wrote a book with the sub-heading “How cells communicate with each other.” Here we are observing communication on an entirely different level of life. Without this cell communication, no organism could develop and continue to exist. And so it is highly appropriate to say that communication is the basis of life.

May our 48th Bicom Congress allow us to experience once again that not only is communication the basis of life, but also the key element of our Congress, that it brings us great pleasure and strengthens the sense of togetherness experienced by Bicom therapists throughout the world.